About many submissions are received during the award cycle?

Approximately 8-12 applications are received each year. 20 applications were submitted for the 2023 award cycle.

What were the most common reasons why an application was not chosen?

- 1) The proposed project should aim to establish a relationship between interprofessional practice and outcomes (community practice, public health education, and/or research). (Note: There must be reportable and measurable practice and/or community health outcomes.)
- 2) The team must have an interprofessional composition, with representation by two or more health professions. (Note: Solely teaching to another discipline does not constitute interprofessional partnership.)
- 3) Public health significance needs to be established. (Note: This must include metrics and necessary background.)
- 4) Community need must be evident, and information provided to review committee, including how need was established. (Note: Community members should be active participants in establishing need.)
- 5) Applicants must be able to demonstrate integration of learning and sustainability of initiatives.
- 6) Meaningfulness of the program to community needs must be established. (Note: Several programs did not provide how this would be of interest to the community.)

If my application was not selected, may I apply following year?
